

SUFFERING WITH BITTERNESS

Cetric Sandford's Dying Days

By Peter Neal
The death of the great gay writer Cetric Sandford, who died last week, has been a bitter pill for many of those who knew him. He was a man of great wit and charm, but his life was a constant struggle against the forces of bigotry and intolerance. His death, at the age of 57, was a tragedy that has left many of his friends and colleagues in a state of shock and grief.

City's gay community has been hit hard by the AIDS epidemic. Many of the young men who were once the life of the party are now struggling to survive. The loss of loved ones has been devastating, and the stigma of the disease has made it difficult for many to seek help and support.

But there is hope. Many of the young men who are still alive are finding ways to cope with their grief and the challenges of living with AIDS. They are seeking support from friends and family, and some are turning to professional help. They are also finding ways to live their lives to the fullest, despite the odds.
